GEOGRAPHY AND TOURISM

Spatial Scale

The human activities, focusing on both tourist-generating and tourist-receiving areas as well as the links between them.

The spatial study can be undertaken at a variety of scales:

- World distribution of climatic zones
- Regional assessment of tourist resources

THE GEOGRAPHICAL OF THE TOURISM SYSTEMS

1. The Places Of Origin Of Tourists (The Tourist-generating Areas)

- Represent the homes of tourists, where journey begin and end.
- Examine the features that stimulate demand for tourism, include the geographical location of an area; its socioeconomic and demographic characteristic.
- These areas represent the main tourist markets in the world.
- Major marketing functions of tourist industry are found here, such as tour operation, and travel retailing.

2. The Tourist Destinations (The receiving areas)

- Places that attract tourist to stay temporarily and will have features and attractions that may not be found in the generating areas.
- Comprise of the accommodation, retailing, and service functions, entertainment, and recreation.
- Most important part of the tourism system, which attract the tourists and energizing the system.

- Recognized as the impacts recipient of the tourism industry, and therefore where the planning and management of tourism is so important.

3) The Travel Route (Transit Routes)

- Link the tourist-generating area and the tourist destination area.
- As the key element in the system as their effectiveness and characteristics shape the size and direction of tourist flows.
- It represents the location of the main transportation component of the tourist industry.

PUSH AND PULL FACTORS

The tourist possesses “push factors” which is confined to a destination that “Push” the tourists to leave the place (psychologically or physically).

A push factor may be a desire to experience weather, extra money, the promise of encounter/fun, a desire to see a new culture etc.

In contrast, tourism destinations have “pull factors” that hopefully match push factors that potential tourist have.

1.PUSH FACTORS

Mainly concerned with the stage of economic development in the generating area, including the factors as levels of affluence, mobility and holiday entitlement. Economic development may cause the pressure of life will provide the “push” to engage in tourism. An unfavourable climate will also provide a strong impetus to travel.

2. PULL FACTORS

Include accessibility, and the attractions and amenities of the destination area. The relative cost of the visit is important, as is the marketing and promotion of the receiving area.

| Push factors                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | Pull factors                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

RELATION BETWEEN PUSH AND PULL FACTORS

Williams and Zelinsky (1970)

- Selected 14 countries that had relatively stable tourist flows over a few years, which accounted for the bulk of the world's tourist traffic.
- A number of factors that helped to explain these flows:

- a) Distances between countries (the greater the distance, the smaller the volume of flow).
- b) International connectivity (shared business or cultural ties between countries).
- c) The general attractiveness of one country for another.

MEASUREMENT OF TOURIST FLOWS CAN BE DIVIDED INTO THREE MAIN TYPES:

- STATISTICS OF VOLUME

Give the number of tourists leaving an area or visiting a destination in a given period of time. Provide basic count of the volume of tourist traffic. It also includes the length of stay of the visitors at their destinations.

- TOURIST CHARACTERISTICS

Measure the quality of tourist flows. Include information on types of tourist (sex, age, socioeconomic group) and their behaviour (structure of the trip, attitudes to the destination)

- EXPENDITURE TOURISM

Tourist flows have important economic significance for the destination, the generating region, and the transport carriers. Tourism represents a flow of money that is earned in one place and spends in another.

FORMS OF TOURISM

1. Types of destination
2. Types of tourism
3. The market
4. Common interest tourism
5. Business and professional tourism
6. Distance of travel

DOMESTIC TOURISM

|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| <ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>• Non-residents travelling in a given</li></ul> | <ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>• Involving residents of a particular country traveling abroad to other countries.</li><li>• Use other currency and encounter a different language.</li></ul> |

THE TOURISM PRODUCT DETERMINE THE NATURE OF THE TOURISM SYSTEM

COMMON INTEREST TOURISM

- The business travellers use the same facilities as those travelling for pleasure and they are not permanent employees or residents of the host destination.
- Therefore they must be included in any definition of tourist. They are constrained in terms of where and when to travel.

HALAL TOURISM

- The type of travel arrangement purchased inclusive tour where two or more components of the tour are purchased together and one price is paid.
- Independent travel arrangements where the traveler purchases the various elements of the trip separately. Tailor-made is a combination of the two.

THE TRAVEL DISTANCE

- Long-haul tourism; taken to be journeys of over 3000 kilometres
- Short-haul tourism; comprises journeys below that distance
- The distinction is important in terms of aircraft operation and for marketing.
- It is important to recognise that each particular form of tourism involve all of the geographical components.
